Dissertation:

Party Composition of State Government and Policy Outputs: Taking Institutional Context Into Account.

I examine the relationship between the partisan balance of state governments (i.e., Democrat versus Republican) and public policy, focusing on welfare policy. I also examine how this relationship changes with the institutional context of the state. The institutional context refers to aspects of state political systems like the governor's veto powers, etc. I find that changes in the party of the governor have greater consequences for public policy where governors have more institutional resources for affecting public policy. Changes in the control of a state legislature by a political party have greater consequences for affecting policy in states where legislatures have more institutional resources. I test these and related hypotheses with a pooled, time-series data set for 47 states for the period 1962-1996.
